A SOUL'S THRENODY.

From Eden-childhood I have strayed. Till lost within a thorny glade. Where surposts lark beneath the shade The years grow dim, as on I go, My path m full of pain and wor; I tread with bleeding feet and slow.

No Angel voice e'er calls to me, No beacon light I ever see: I'm lost in hopsiess misory.

What have I done throughout the past, With all my schemes of grand and vast. To make my memory ever last?

If Heaven bestowed on me the power To live beyond the faceting hour, My slothful soul ne'er gained the dower Or if I strove with might through day

And labored in the night alway, I wake to naught but common clay. Howe'er my life with love was fraught I me'er attained the blice I sought Oh, would I had not struped aside.

Had I pursued the narrow path, I ne'er had felt this flery scath The shards are sharp, the way is long THY love is great-THY arm is strong.

Oh hear my hopeless, dying moun, As on these borning sands I groun; I would not purish thus, alone. Protect me from mine acony,
And lead my wandering stope to Thee;
My tortuzed spirit would be free.

The below hat washed my guilt away, My body cleaves to common clay;
My body cleaves to the perfect day.

Prof. Wise contends that at a distance of from three to four milas from the earth there is a current of wind illowing from wast to east which is constantly the same, never varying in its direction and rarely in the rate of velocity. On this proposition he has experimented for years and has not failed once to observe this lavariable feature is the atmosphere. His notes on the Gospais have met with universal favor, and probably no commentary of modern times has had as wide a circulation in so short a time. In Sabbath schools they are supplanting, in a great measure, all other commentaries, as the author has taken special pains to adapt his notes to the minds of ordinary readers of the Bible.
